Diego Padilla (Marc Clotet) is crowned a world chess champion in Spain in the early 1930s. At the tournament, he meets Marianne Latour (Melina Matthews), a French journalist. They fall in love, get married, and have a baby. But with Spain in the midst of a violent civil war, Marianne convinces her husband to move to Paris. Shortly thereafter, despite his apolitical views, Diego is arrested for being a spy and sent to a prison run by the Nazis. His chess skills come to the attention of chess enthusiast Colonel Maier (Stefan Weinert), and fate offers Diego a chance to survive prison and the war, and to see his wife and daughter again.

1937 Spain: lines are being drawn, sides are being chosen... and the world will never be the same. As the citizens of the village of Guernica live with the day-to-day realities of the Civil War, an American journalist (James D'Arcy) secretly joins forces with a local press-office censor (María Valverde) to work against the stringent restrictions that are becoming more common. But everything changes when German forces attack the town, and the freedom of the press becomes a vital weapon. Based on the historical events of the bombing that set the stage for World War II.
